Reforming the Indian Police

17 May, 2013   Dr M N Buch, Centre for Governance and Political Studies, VIF   View1385   Comments 0

In the case relating to irregularities or even criminality in the allocation of coal blocks, where investigation was handed over to the CBI, has taken strong objection to government intervention in proceedings pending before the agency and the Hon'ble Judges have remarked that rest till CBI becomes independent of government control. This has once again led to clamour for police reforms.

Let us go to the Act which created the Indian Police, the Indian Police Act of 1861. The Preamble of the Police Act reads, "Whereas to reorganise the police and to make it a more efficient instrument for the prevention and detection of crime ..." Let us compare this with 1978, which followed 117 years later. The Preamble to this Act reads, "An Act to amend and consolidate the laws relating to the regulation of the Union Territory of Delhi". This Act does not in any way detract from the objective of the 1861 Act which was to make the police instrument for the prevention and detection of crime. In other words, the primary function of the police is to prevent and detect crime for the purpose that we have organised a police force. Section 23 of the Police Act of 1861 reads as under:- "It shall be the duty of every police officer to obey and execute all orders and warrants lawfully issued to him by any competent authority; to collect and communicate intelligence affecting to prevent the commission of offences and public nuisances; to detect and bring offenders to justice; and to apprehend the persons authorised to apprehend and for whose apprehension sufficient ground exists..." When we look at the Delhi Police Act of 1978 we find that and 60 the provisions of section 23 of the Police Act of 1861 have been elaborated but in essence the duties of the police remain as was. Even in the Model Police Bill prepared by the Soli Sorabji Committee this position has not substantially changed. The duty of the police is to prevent crime from taking place, investigate crimes when they occur and apprehend criminals. This is fundamental to every police force in the world.

The Police Act notwithstanding, the principal powers and functions of the police are given in the Code of Criminal Procedure. For example, arrest of persons is given in chapter V Cr.P.C. and in effecting an arrest the police officer is bound by the provisions of law. He has no authority to let an unauthorised person direct or pressurise a police officer to arrest any person or persons. In fact section 60A Cr.P.C. is very specific. It reads, "Arrest to be made strictly according to the Code: No arrest shall be made except in accordance with the provisions of this Code for the time being in force providing for arrest". A Magistrate, a Judge, a superior police officer who is directly connected with the case of the arrest of a person but certainly no minister, no politician, no other officer can give such an order to the police. If such an order is given, it is to be ignored.

Chapter X Cr.P.C. gives the Executive Magistracy and the police the additional duty of maintaining public order and tranquility. In other words, the police is responsible for ensuring that law and order is maintained. For this purpose it is empowered to use force, including lethal force, to disperse an assembly, to prevent riots and to ensure that there is peace and tranquility. Chapter XI reminds the police that it is its duty to interpose to prevent the commission of any cognisable offence. Preventive action, therefore, is not only permissible, it is enjoined and failure to take preventive action could be treated as dereliction of duty. A police officer may arrest without a warrant a person designing to commit a cognisable offence or intervene to prevent injury to public property. Once again the police is required to follow the law and intervene whenever there is adequate ground to suggest that a cognisable offence may be committed. In this behalf the police is not subordinate to anyone and must act according to law.

Chapter XII Cr.P.C. is one of the most important parts of the Code of Criminal Procedure because it is under this chapter that the police receives information in relation to a cognisable offence and then proceeds with its investigation, arrives at a conclusion about the person or persons concerned, if there is sufficient evidence to establish a prima facie case, or decides that no case is made out against any person and, therefore, the case is dropped with the permission of a competent court. This is the chapter under which the police presents a challan before a Magistrate and if there is cognisance thereon, the police thereafter proceeds to help the prosecution in the trial which would follow.

In the matter of investigation the police, which includes the Delhi Special Police Establishment in whose name CBI takes action, is totally free from any pressure by anyone. There are only three authorities which can ask questions to the police regarding an investigation. The first is the superior officer, who, under section 36 Cr.P.C. by virtue of his right to exercise the same power as the officer in charge of the police station located within the limits of the station, can call the station officer to account. The second is a designated police officer who is so directed by the state government under section 157 to be forwarded by the station officer to a competent magistrate. Such superior officer gives instructions to the officer in charge of the police station as he thinks fit and may record such instructions on the report under section 157 to be forwarded to the Magistrate. The limitation here is that no officer who is competent to give directions to the station officer may order him to function in a particular manner.

of law, add to the charge-sheet names of the persons against whom no prima facie case is made out or delete from the list persons against whom no prima facie case is made out. The instructions have to be aimed at improving the quality of the investigation and nothing more and nothing less.

A third authority would be the Magistrate before whom the report is presented. Under section 159 Cr.P.C. a Magistrate may direct an investigating officer to hold a preliminary enquiry or himself hold such enquiry. Such intervention is legal and lawful, but it cannot result in the police being given instructions which are not lawful. When the investigation is completed and the investigating officer submits his report under section 173 to a Magistrate, either by way of a challan or as a final report requesting permission to close the case, the report is submitted through a superior police officer designated under section 158 and such officer may either immediately forward the report to the Magistrate or order further investigation. Once, however, the challan has been presented the responsibility passes to the Judiciary for further action, even though under section 173 Cr.P.C even after the challan is presented the police is competent to make supplementary investigation and forward the report to the Magistrate.

This elaboration of law becomes necessary in order to explain that in the law as it stands today there is an absolute bar on anyone, not only a police officer or a Magistrate, to intervene in the investigation of an offence. The Chief Minister, the Minister in charge of Home, Ministers, politicians, members of the media, people at large are totally precluded from any role in the investigation of an offence. The autonomy of the police in this behalf is absolute and it has been so ever since the British established the present system of policing and justice in India. The amendments to the Criminal Procedure Code, various Acts governing the police, have not altered this position, that is, in the investigation and prosecution of an offence the police is totally independent of any executive or political authority. This does not mean that if the police needs legal advice it cannot refer the matter to the Law Department for obtaining the advice of the Law Department, of the Advocate General or the Attorney General, but this has to be done in a proper manner. All questions have to be forwarded for a clarification or advice and the legal advice must be in writing and in the form of an opinion. It cannot be a mere order or a directive because ultimately the decision whether to prosecute or not and the charges on which the prosecution is to be based are for the investigating officer. The Law Ministry or Law Department cannot give any directive whatsoever to the police in this behalf. This becomes particularly important in the light of the DSPE/CBI investigation of the cases relating to coal allocation. The mistake that the DSPE made was in showing the report meant for submission to the Supreme Court to the Union Law Minister, the Attorney General and certain officers representing the Coal Ministry and the Prime Minister's Office. These are all persons who have no authority whatsoever in either suggesting to the police or directing it to change its report. This is all the more so because DSPE had not made any formal reference for legal advice and, therefore, all the unauthorised interventions were without jurisdiction. Whose fault is this? Certainly the law cannot be faulted because some persons violated the law. It is the Director of the DSPE and his officers who acted wrongly in answering a summons by the Law Minister. What they should have done is to politely but firmly tell him that they are unable to share any information with him regarding a specific case. The Supreme Court can direct that officers shall obey the law, but it cannot direct them to ignore this direction the only remedy is to punish him. Any other action by the Supreme Court in the face of the existing clear provisions is tautological and uncalled for.

Having established that the existing law gives the police complete freedom in the matter of investigation of offences and for which they are protected from undue influence or pressure, what are the areas in which government may and in fact should give directions to the police? In the manner of discharging accountability in the matter of the functioning of the police? When we talk of police reforms we must take these into account and foremost it must be recognised that the police is a part of the executive government, created by law and as such it is both a creature and a servant of society as part of the Executive. To state that the Executive has no role to play in the matter of policing is something which is unacceptable. The Executive brings legislation before the Legislature to further its own ability to perform as an effective organ of the State and the Executive cannot be diluted. Similarly, it is the Legislature which legislates, even in matters relating to the police and this authority cannot be diluted. The power of superintendence over the police, including the Delhi Special Police Establishment or CBI constituted under any law, has to continue to vest in the Executive, if for no other reason than the fact that rules, regulations, etc., framed under the Police Act, all come under the definition of delegated legislation and would form an extension of the law in question. Delegated legislation cannot be given to subordinate authorities and, therefore, the ultimate arbiter of what rules and regulations will govern the police has to be the Executive Government. The police, in addition to the matter of offences also is a guardian of public peace and tranquility. This calls for certain regulatory powers of executive magistracy, including regulating the congregation of people, prescribing instructions and standing orders regarding traffic movements, public meetings, etc. Standing orders or procedures of how to deal with a law and order situation, a mob, and an assembly, contain the instructions which government wants the police to follow. It is legitimate for government to state how force can be used, the manner in which it may be used and the attitude of the police towards different types of assemblies. For example, government may desire that a crowd of women and children, students, a religious congregation, etc., should be handled with great restraint by the police even if faced by the use of force or orders by the assembly. It would not be permitted to use extreme force against persons who are individually quite helpless. Similarly, students, workers with a genuine grievance, people who are handicapped would have to be dealt with patiently, sympathetically and with restraint. Government must make this clear to the police. On the other hand a violent riot in which there is arson, deadly assault, looting and in which the attack is aimed at a particular community must be dealt with very firmly, with adequate force being applied at the earliest juncture to bring the riot under control. Here the police must act swiftly and if the use of firearms is called for, the police must do so, though under strict fire control. The instructions of government would be different from those relating to a collection of women and children. The power of superintendence goes further. If a police officer disobeys instructions or is derelict in his duty government should call him to account immediately and mete out punishment. In this matter the subordination of the police to government has to be complete and there is no way in which the police can be independent in this behalf. This does not mean that they will work under undue constraint, but they will observe the instructions given by the government, follow instructions or pay an immediate price.

It is argued that government should virtually have no power in the matter of postings and transfers of police officers. It is considered that which sap morale is arbitrariness in personnel management and, therefore, such arbitrariness must be removed. This is a principle which board to all government organisations and should not be restricted to the police only. There must be a specific policy regarding postings: such a policy cannot eliminate government altogether from personnel management of the police. If there are charges of misconduct against which are raised in the Legislature, can the Chief Minister or the Home Minister turn around and state that he has no authority in this behalf legitimately demand that if the law does not authorise the government to even look into police misconduct, except on the advice of a court which may take its own sweet time in reaching a decision, then the law should be changed and this would have to be done notwithstanding given by any court, including the Supreme Court.

Let us carry the argument further. At present the District Magistrate is an agency not under the police but with certain powers under the Soli Sorabji Committee has not recommended dilution of these powers. However, there is another power that the DM has, which is that a grievance against the police can go to him and without in any way intervening in any matter in which the police has exclusive jurisdiction ask the Superintendent of Police about the specific complaint made to him and then take steps to persuade the police to settle the grievance. The immediate remedy available to people against police excesses and so far it has been working fairly well. The grievances redressal machinery of the Soli Sorabji Committee and pleaded for before the Supreme Court by persons who are fighting a series of writ petitions in the form of Public Interest Litigation, would be procedure bound and would not be able to give quick relief to a person who has a complaint against the police. If a person illegally detained by the police, not having the wherewithal to approach a court of law and being kept at the tender mercy of the police, own agenda. To whom should such a person turn? By the time the grievance redressal machinery swings into action the man may have undergone humiliation, illegal detention, physical violence amounting to torture and worse. Should there not be someone on the ground by whom at least he can be looked at and the police be made immediately accountable for its actions?

We are not living in Britain or Scandinavia. We are living in India in which, like other arms of government, the police also can be arbitrary and deliberately or unknowingly uninfluenced by law and, perhaps, in some sort of arrangement with the very criminals it is supposed to suppress. A civilised police force just as one wants an educated teacher and an honest revenue official, a knowledgeable forest official, a transport department not steeped in corruption and a municipality which actually serves the people. The police cannot be the only organisation to be subjected to control. The police be left to its own devices in which government virtually has no power to correct wrongdoing and, in the name of autonomy, shown the door. These are all factors which must be taken into account when we talk of police reforms. It is not an easy task, but there are two different but parallel approaches to reforming the police. The first is to remind the police of its own authority under law and then keep a check that the police actually functions according to the law. The second, equally important approach is that whereas arbitrariness by officials dealing with the police is eliminated, the system of accountability is tightened and the police must be forced to render account and try to do better. That, according to me, is the true reform of the police.
